“A globalized generation raised in a mosaic society of different cultures has in itself a moral code with a more inclusive vision than previous generations.

The challenge for the future is to be able to uphold the traditions by ethically knocking over the taboos and barriers that prevent societal equity and equality.”

“In this unprecedented time of global pandemic we have seen restrictions in travel; the closing of national borders, social isolation and social distancing.

More than ever we need a new way of togetherness in the public space beyond physical borders by connecting distant places and people and facilitating exchange through artistic networked interventions.”

“Climate change is the challenge of the present and future, however, climate activism currently has been overshadowed by other pressing issues like the pandemic and isolation.

Now more than ever, art and creativity are approaches that can show new ways to work and interact, as well as raise awareness of these different issues during the social isolation and pandemic, envisioning more imaginative and sustainable future scenarios.”

“After two decades of crisis in EU and globally, financial, health, societal, environmental, we grow a generation that explores and develops new paths of self-identification, resilience and co-existence.

Art is becoming an imperative for protecting the heart of Europe, a source of inspiration for all forms of progress and an implicit factor of Democracy. Digital tools can and should contribute to highlighting the urgency and need for more accessibility to cultural and creative foundations, as the only timeless prerequisite for growth: individuals’ and societies’.”
